

Nancy
Hanks
Lincoln
Public Library

FRONTISPIECE.

JUVENILE CHARITY.

“There,” said Charles to the Sailor, giving him the crown, “take that; I wish it may be of service to you; it was given me by my father as a keepsake, but I am sure he had rather I should relieve the distressed with it, than shew it to him twenty years hence.” Page 48.

TALES

OF

THE BOWER.

OR,

REWARDS FOR DILIGENCE
IN STUDY.

BOSTON:

PRINTED AND SOLD BY JAMES LORING, Book-Seller, No. 132 Washington-Street.

1826.

INTRODUCTION.

AT the death of a much beloved and lamented wife, Mr. Dawson retired from the busy concerns of an extensive trade. The time was past, when the hours of relaxation from business afford the truest pleasure, in the affectionate conversation of her, whose happiness was his only wish, and for whom alone he had continued an anxious and laborious employment. She was partial to a life of rational gaiety, (if I may be allowed the expression) which was of course attended with expense ; and as he knew no greater felicity than in her comfort, he rejoiced that his industry would enable her to enjoy it ; while she repaid his kindness with grateful tenderness, and unceasing attention. She was now no more ; and the society of that acquaintance in whose company she delighted, no longer possessed charms for him. Two twin boys of seven, and a fine little girl of six years of age, accompanied their father to his country retreat, where, by a willingness to be on friendly terms with all his neighbours, they were universally beloved, and found in a few respectable visitors, a charming and sufficient society. At the bottom of the garden, which was of considerable length, was a bower formed by laurels, jessamines and honeysuckles interwoven, and which, assisted by the care of the former tenants, was now a most fragrant and complete shelter. This bower appeared to Mr. Dawson the place best suiting the plan he had laid out for the amusement of his children; it was a place most inviting in itself, but with his intended addition, could not fail to be a proper reward for well finishing the morning lessons. He had written a collection of interesting tales, the morals of which were instructive and artless; and, in a spot like the bower, where retirement rendered them more impressive, he judged they would be peculiarly entertaining, and at the same time improve the minds of his young hearers. When he first made known his intention, the promises of good behaviour, with the grateful kisses of his little family, were to him the most delightful acknowledgments. The evening appointed to begin the series of tales, arrived; every ear was open, every mouth shut, every eye fixed on the kind parent; who, before he opened the book, thus addressed them—

“My dear children, I am much pleased to see your joy on this occasion, and most earnestly hope it may be the means of preserving that duty to me, affection to each other, and good behaviour to your acquaintance and neighbours, you now cherish.—Be assured, while it is so, no exertion on my part shall be wanted for your entertainment. Your conduct will regulate the quantity. In the hope that I shall have occasion soon for a fresh supply, I now begin.”

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
THE AFFECTIONATE COUSINS	9
MRS. SNOWDEN'S DAUGHTER	27
ARDOUR OF FILIAL AFFECTION	44
THE SILK WORMS	63
THE ACCIDENT	67
THE PUNISHMENT OF OBSTINACY	73
THE BARGAINS	80
THE REWARD OF SINCERITY	93
SELF IMPORTANCE	104

THE
AFFECTIONATE COUSINS.

LOUISA was the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Manners, and possessed, besides the advantages peculiar to an only child, a most excellent disposition. Her father and mother were rich, and loved her with the truest affection. She had been educated under private masters, and by the progress she had made in her various studies and accomplishments, she amply rewarded her parents for their care and expense. Yet was she not in the smallest degree proud of her superior abilities, but constantly maintained that propriety of conduct which shews real gentility and good education. They had a country-house not very far from London, as Mr. Manners was engaged in a large concern that frequently required his attendance there, but he usually returned to his family in the evening.

It was one afternoon, when Louisa was about ten years of age, that a little girl sat crying at the garden gate. Louisa was walking by herself in the garden, and heard her voice at a distance, for some time, before she could find from what part it proceeded ; at last she discovered her at the gate, apparently quite fatigued with crying, and exhausted by hunger, for she said she had not eaten any thing all day. Louisa delayed not a moment to desire she might be carried into the parlour, and that some bread and milk might be given to her, which she ate with a very hearty appetite, and seemed extremely thankful. She appeared about six years old ; she said her name was Patty Clifford, that her mamma had left her a long while, promising to return soon, and commanding her not to stir ; she said she had travelled in the waggon for more than a week, and that she lived somewhere in Wales, but could not speak the name of the place. Mrs. Manners immediately perceived she had been left at the gate by her mother, with the intent of getting rid of her, and had nearly resolved to send her to the workhouse ; but Louisa begged her mamma would not part with her. “ See,” said she, “ how the tears drop from her pretty blue eyes ; let her stay, mamma, I shall love such a nice little companion ; and I have almost money enough to find her in clothes myself. If you will find her in bread and milk, mamma, I will save all my money to buy her shoes and stockings, or any thing she may want. Would you like to live with me, my love?" said she in the kindest and most gentle tone, addressing herself to the girl. "I want my mamma," said Patty. "But perhaps your mamma will not return," said Louisa, "and I am sure she does not love you so well as I shall, if you are a good girl." "O dear! I am so sorry mamma will not come back," said Patty. "I love her very much; why will she not come back?" It was thus she answered every kind solicitation Mrs. Manners or Louisa made to her, till Mr. Manners returned from town. "Heyday!" cried he, on entering the parlour, "whose little blue-eyed girl is this?" "Your's, papa," said Louisa; "her mamma left her at our garden gate, while she went a little farther, and either could not find her way back, or has ran away and does not mean to come again; but that is not Patty's fault, you know, papa; and she is so good—and loves her mamma so—I think I shall be quite fond of her.”

“Why, my love, are you going to keep her!” “Yes, papa, that is—if—you have no objection——you know you have often said, you wished I had a companion—Now though Patty is young, I shall soon teach her many things, I dare say.”

“I can read and spell,” said little Patty.—“Can you indeed? my pretty creature,” said Mr. Manners—“what can you read?”—“I can read in the Bible,” she replied; “and I can read in small books too—Goody Two Shoes and Little Dick.” Mr. Manners looked at Louisa; she knew his meaning, and ran for her books, with which she soon returned, consisting of “Rainsford Villa,” the “Sisters of the Cavern,” a few others equally amusing and instructive; when, to the surprise of every one, Patty read a page in each volume, most delightfully, minding her stops, and paying the greatest attention. She was much pleased at the praises she received, and said, her good mamma had taught her to read ; in short, she so charmed Mr. Manners, that he said he would no longer hesitate to adopt her, and from that day to treat her as his own. The child appearing quite sleepy, Louisa put her to bed, by the side of her own, to which she likewise retired. One thing particularly pleased Mrs. Manners : while Louisa was kneeling before her, saying her prayers, she observed Patty burst into tears, and on asking her the cause, she replied, “ Where shall Patty kneel ? mamma is away, and Patty always says her prayers.” Mrs. Manners with much pleasure placed her before her, and she said the Lord’s prayer extremely well indeed, concluding with a short prayer for the blessing of quiet and refreshing sleep for herself, her relations, and friends.

After supper, Mr. Manners thus addressed his lady : “ The only reason I had for hesitating to grant Louisa's request, respecting adopting this little foundling, was the precarious situation of my poor sister.—Since the death of her husband, I have not once heard from her—nor do I know what family she may have; (for whatever number there may be, all of them will have a claim on my duty, and all of them I must support.) She has never written to me, since her imprudence in marrying again, against my consent; nor can I discover, as you know, notwithstanding my inquiries, where she is to be found; which renders it peculiarly necessary that I keep myself ready to discharge so serious an obligation, whenever I may be called upon.”

As little Patty increased in years, she increased in goodness, and in person, and at sixteen years of age was much admired. One young gentleman of the neighbourhood was particularly struck with her mildness of speech and delicacy of manners, both of which she owed to the example of her affectionate friend Louisa, who was by this time a most charming young woman, and engaged to a gentleman of fortune at a small distance. The name of Patty's admirer was Belmont; he frequently visited Mr. Manners, and was of a very respectable family, and of excellent principles: he was very partial to Patty, but her want of fortune was a bar, though the only one, to their union: his parents could not by any means be brought to consent to call her daughter. Mr. Manners much regretted this obstacle to her happiness, but he felt himself bound by the strongest ties of duty, to keep himself prepared to assist the young family of his sister, should they ever put in their claim to his benevolence. Louisa's wedding-day was fixed; the festival was to be rural and very splendid. Patty was frequently thoughtful, but never melancholy, having been taught resignation as a very principal duty, and she well knew repining could not assist her situation, and that patience might bring about some unforeseen event, to facilitate her happiness. It was at this time, that Mr. Manners was taken very ill; and having the advice of several physicians, one of them gave it as his opinion, his disorder was a species of ague, and that it might be a long time before he would entirely recover. This was a most unfortunate occurrence. Louisa's wedding was to be celebrated in less than three weeks, and Mr. Manners was confined to his room. He was, however, attended almost constantly by his affectionate wife and daughter, nor was Patty wanting in attention to him. A thousand ways did she endeavour to shew her gratitude for his kindness to her, and her goodness of heart was universally talked of. She would often sit by his bedside, with Louisa, and they would read to him, by turns, for hours. In short, she loved him with all the affection of a child ; and he observed her rising excellencies with the fondness of a parent.

It was one afternoon, when Mrs. Manners and Louisa were sitting with him, that Patty ran abruptly into the chamber.—She had begun to speak, but stopped almost immediately, struck with the impropriety of her entrance.—“Speak, my sweet girl!” said Mrs. Manners, observing her confusion, and wishing to encourage her—“do not hesitate to say what you intended.” “Excuse me, dear Madam,” she replied, “but I know not whether I am most sorry to have delayed so long, or glad to have just thought of, a circumstance that will, I hope, be successful towards restoring the health of my dear guardian.” She immediately took from the lining of her gown sleeve a small packet of white paper, on which was written, “A charm for the ague ;”

though the words were scarcely legible. She entreated Mr. Manners to allow it to be bound to his arm, as it was impossible to do him harm, and the idea of its nature might have the wished effect. He permitted her request to be complied with, charmed with this new token of her gratitude, and she retired completely happy.

A few days afterwards, (whether the charm had taken effect, or whether the plans of the faculty had operated successfully, the latter of which was the most probable) Mr. Manners found himself growing much better, and continued amending, till he was entirely recovered. Patty's inquiries were unceasing, and she heard with rapture that her dear guardian's health was perfectly re-established. The succeeding evening, after Louisa and Patty had retired to their chambers, Mr. Manners took off his "charm for the ague," and expressed a very earnest desire to see its contents, as he was confident, if it was to that he owed his recovery, it must contain some kind of herb or drug powerful in its nature, for that he had no faith whatever in charms, but had merely agreed to Patty's request, it was so affectionately pressing. Mrs. Manners was at first much averse to its being opened, saying it was almost as bad as reading another's letter; but he persisted, that, as it was certainly many years old, it might conduce to the benefit of the community, should it contain drugs, or any thing else useful in so dreadful a complaint. Mrs. Manners agreed, and the charm was unbound; when, to their great astonishment, they discovered a bank note of a hundred pounds, accompanied by a piece of paper, many times folded, containing as follows:—

“If my dear brother be not deaf to the cries of infantine sorrow—if my sweet babe find in his kindness, protection from the cruelty of the world, and a guide through its intricate paths, may an unfortunate sister's prayers be heard at that high tribunal, to which they are most earnestly, though humbly addressed, and draw down blessings on his charitable head. The enclosed is the scanty saving of fourteen years hard labour, part of the practical contrition of a sincere penitent—to which she dooms herself while life remains. May her dear infant, the only surviving partaker of her mother's griefs—by a dutiful obedience, and filial love, pay the debt of gratitude her wretched parent has incurred to the best of brothers."

This was a discovery most joyful to Mr. Manners and his wife. It was impossible for any event to have occurred, more conducive to the continuance of his health. He could now not only look with rapture upon Patty as his niece, but would be enabled to do away the objection made against their marriage by the friends of Mr. Belmont, without fear of future claims, that might operate as a check to his generosity. He therefore resolved to celebrate the weddings both of his daughter and niece on the same day.

The next morning, at breakfast, Mr. Manners was very jocosely lavish in the praises of Patty's "charm for the ague," and finished by asking her how she came by it, and how long it had been in her possession. Patty, unprepared for the subject, and remembering the melancholy loss she had sustained in consequence of it (though by that means she had been taken into a family, every one of whom she loved with the tenderest and most sincere affection)—burst into tears; and it was a considerable time before she was sufficiently recovered to satisfy Mr. Manners's curiosity. At length, however, she faintly replied—"I can just remember, Sir, my mother sewed it in my frock sleeve the day before we left home, and made me promise to keep it as a “charm for the ague,” and never to open it, or lend it to any body, unless to my best friends: I was old enough then to know how sacred a promise should be kept, and have most attentively observed it; having sewed it in every new frock or gown I have had since, till your illness called forth my feeble endeavours to assist you; what it can contain, to make it a cure for the ague, I cannot imagine; and more particularly do I wonder at my poor mother’s giving it to me by that term, as I know she used to ridicule every instance of superstition.”

“And you have never opened it?” said Mr. Manners.

“No, Sir;” she modestly but firmly replied.

“But I have—my dear;” he rejoined. —She started. “My first motive,” continued he, “I will confess was curiosity; but a wish to benefit my neighbours was the strongest cause, and how it has been rewarded this note will shew.” He then presented both papers to her. When he saw she had read the note, he threw his arms round her, and while the tears dropped on his cheek, he kissed her, exclaiming, “My niece, my child!” Mrs. Manners embraced her with fondness; Louisa with exstasy. Patty was unable to reply to their caresses but in silence. At length she presented the bank note to Mr. Manners—“This, Sir, and ten more if I had them,” said she, “are yours.—I owe you more than I can ever repay.” “I will take your gift, my love,” said Mr. Manners, “and in return you must accept this” (presenting her with a draft on his banker for three thousand pounds.)—“Louisa has one for double the sum, and on the day fixed for my daughter’s wedding, will I present you to Mr. Belmont, whose parents I know will joyfully consent to your union."

Tears again flowed from all; and an affectionate pressure of the hand was all that Patty could offer; her heart was full, but her eyes spoke a gratitude more eloquent than words.

One circumstance I must not forget to mention; a letter was sent to Mr. Manners a few months afterwards, acquainting him with the death of Mrs. Clifford, in the workhouse belonging to some parish many miles distant; which likewise mentioned her having been previously ill for a few days, but unwilling to mention the names of her relations, till it was too late for them to assist her. This he did not think fit to shew to Patty, till a considerable length of time had enabled her better to support the distressing intelligence.

We may learn from this tale, how highly proper it is to pay an early attention to the advice and example of good parents ; as it was from good habits alone that our little heroine came to her happy fortune. Children may think they have plenty of time before them, to learn and to profit in, but they know not at what particular period their knowledge may be of most service to them ; and will frequently be brought to lament their neglect, when it is too late to remedy the evils that consequently ensue. A child will be concerned at the loss of a trifle of money, or a part of its dress, that may easily be renewed, but how lavish are they of their time ! a treasure that no sums of money can re-purchase when once it is spent. How idly do they spend it ! how many let it slip unprofitably away, and are willingly blind and deaf to the remonstrances of parents and guardians, whose experience has taught them to know its true value !

MRS. SNOWDEN'S DAUGHTER:

OR, THE

PROOFS OF REAL AFFECTION.

It was the lot of Mrs. Snowden to be left a widow, at a time when her three lovely daughters stood most in need of a father's kind protection, and mild authority, to give effect to the affectionate advice of an indulgent mother. Mr. Snowden had not been able to amass even sufficient to leave his beloved family in the same easy circumstances which they enjoyed during his life, and his dying words regretted his inability. But a treasure infinitely more valuable, his widow found herself possessed of. In the dutiful affection of her children to her, and the filial love they shewed to each other, she deemed herself sufficiently wealthy, to look with indifference on the more glittering, but less worthy riches, that usually are most adored. Her daughters were her only comforts; Theresa, Emmeline, and Harriet, her chief companions; in whose innocent and endearing conversation she would find a pleasure to banish that melancholy, which solitude cannot fail to create. Their natural dispositions were certainly different, but such a spirit of unanimity constantly prevailed, that on a first acquaintance it would have been imagined that they had but one temper equally shared between them; for their only endeavour was to please and accommodate each other. With such excellent hearts, will my young readers imagine it was possible they could think wrong? Certainly it was more than possible; it was probable—a good heart may be easily deceived, or misled, if not attended by the prudent guidance of an experienced head ; and a mother, while she sees with rapture the goodness of her children's hearts, will wish to direct every action by her advice, and exert every means in her power to preserve them in virtue.

In the neighbourhood where they resided, lived several families ; but among the whole was only one, the younger branches of whom were remarked by the young ladies as deserving the familiar though innocent attention of a passing bow or curtsy.—Cheerfulness and good humour seemed to be their characteristics, and it was impossible to possess greater recommendations in the eyes of the young Snowdens. Unfortunately, however, the acquaintance between the young folks was not so much encouraged by their respective parents, as they expected and indeed wished—for frequent looks, and good-natured salutations, had formed an intimacy, which, though it might certainly have been strengthened, it was difficult on a sudden to put an end to. Theresa, though she had never presumed to question her mother concerning her motives for disapproving the acquaintance, had more than once looked with displeasure when any hint on the subject was thrown out. Mrs. Snowden had observed it; but imagining it would not go farther, had never taken notice of it at the time. Yet unwilling to let her daughter cherish even a discontented thought, fearing it might in time (though perhaps unintentionally) amount to disobedience, she determined the first favourable opportunity, at once to forbid any farther intimacy with the young Brights.

It was not long before an occasion presented itself. Emmeline and Harriet were absent, and Theresa was sitting with her mother at work, in the parlour, when she thus began the following dialogue.—

Theresa. Mamma, I have a favour to beg of you.

Mamma. What is it? my love; if I can grant it with propriety, I certainly will.

Theresa. I declare I am almost afraid to name it, but I have thought of it very often, and cannot see the least impropriety in it.

Mamma. If you really cannot see any impropriety in it, why are you almost afraid to name it?

Theresa. Because—I am not sure—that you—

Mamma. Let me hear it, Theresa, and I will spare you your reasons—you know I never love to refuse the request of any of my daughters; I see with much pleasure they attend to my advice, and I am sure if they ever wish for any unreasonable indulgence, it is for want of judgment, and not for want of goodness of heart.

Theresa. O! mamma, how you delight me—I do indeed try to do every thing you wish me, and if the request I am going to make is improper, I shall be consoled for your refusal, by the kind assurance you have just given me.

Mamma. And now, my love, what have you to ask?

Theresa. You know, mamma, we walked out yesterday afternoon with Dinah—well, Charles Bright accidentally met us, and with the greatest politeness bowed, and passed.

Mamma. Passed!

Theresa. He returned almost immediately, and desired Dinah would present his best compliments to you, and request you would permit me to join a snug party in an excursion on the water to-morrow. Miss Janson, Miss Smart and her brother, and Emily Bright, are to be of the party—and Tom Atkins and himself are to assist as watermen—they talk of going to Nahant, and that will take the whole day even if we set out early—I think it would be charming.

Mamma. How was it that Dinah did not mention this?

Theresa. Because I desired—because I thought—I said I could mention it as well.—

Mamma. Or better, Theresa—was it not so?

Theresa. Ah! Mamma.

Mamma. My dearest girl! I need not assure you of my constant wish to give my children pleasure: but I do not love them so insincerely, as to endeavour to procure it at so great a risk. In a word, my love, I am sorry to refuse your request.—Your good sense will soon reconcile you to the propriety of it, assisted by one or two reasons I shall now proceed to give you: in the first place, I do not entirely approve of the party. I have reason to think Mr. Bright does not wish his sons to form an acquaintance with my family, and of course, I would not suffer my children to join in any scheme with his, unknown to, or unapproved of by him. Again, I have ever considered an excursion on the water, under the guidance of young people alone, as likely to be attended with very great danger. They are apt to confide too much in the chance of escaping an accident, and are consequently unprepared to remedy it, by neglecting the first means of preventing it.

Theresa gently bowed, and was silent—Mrs. Snowden saw she was a little concerned, and therefore kindly left her to compose herself.

Two days afterwards, as Mrs. Snowden, Theresa, and Emmeline were sitting in the parlor, waiting for Harriet to come down to breakfast, Emmeline, who had not heard either the proposal of her sister, or the result of it, thus addressed her mother:—

Emmeline. O! mamma, I have a favor to ask you, that I think you cannot refuse, particularly as I know you will partake the pleasure it will give us.

Mrs. Snowden. That I certainly shall, my love, if I approve the method in which you intend yourself the attainment of it.

Emmeline. A grand gala is to be given at Vauxhall, with illuminations, and every kind of beautiful embellishment—music and singing, and all kinds of refreshments—fireworks, and every thing that can make it charming; now I have often heard you say you used to be extremely pleased at Vauxhall, and as we never were there, I really think you cannot do a greater kindness, than to take us there on Tuesday next.

Mrs. Snowden. From the fine description you have given, my love, I am afraid you have thought of this proposal a long while, and it has made a little impression on your mind. I am rather concerned at this, because your disappointment will be the greater at my refusing your request: not but that I know your good sense is sufficient to convince you I am right in so doing, if your duty did not teach you to think so. Vauxhall is a place to which, whoever goes, should go under the protection of gentlemen—and—Emmeline. Well, then, I am sure—but I beg your pardon, mamma, for interrupting you.

Mrs. Snowden. Most willingly granted, Emmeline; but tell me, love, what were you going to say in answer to my observation concerning the necessity of going under the protection of gentlemen.

Emmeline. Why, that I know all the Brights are to be there, and that being neighbours, and as many gentlemen of them, as we are ladies, it would be delightful.

Mrs. Snowden. My dear girl! it would be my chief pleasure to grant you any indulgence, which I could with propriety: but this I must refuse you; one reason I will give you now, and it is not unlikely that more will arise to shew the prudence of so doing.

Mr. Bright has had many opportunities of forming an acquaintance with my family, if he had been so disposed—he may, from motives equally prudent as I think mine, wish to prevent his sons from engaging in intimacy with young women of your ages, before their minds are rightly sedate, and their ideas properly enlarged. Young men of the best dispositions, (and I am persuaded they are so, in the main) may be led away by a desire of following that erroneous and dangerous system of fashion, which is ever changing, and never worth adhering to ; and it is highly prudent in all parents to keep their children from hastily forming too early connexions.

At that instant Harriet entered the room with a note, which she had just received, she said, from Mr. Janson's maid-servant who waited for an answer. Mrs. Snowden read it aloud, and it was to the following effect.

“ Dear Madam,

“ I WRITE in extreme haste, and in great distress, to know if Miss Snowden joined our young party yesterday on the water, and if she did, whether she be yet returned ? My poor girl is rendered incapable of telling me, by a shock she received from the oversetting of the boat. She was brought home to me speechless, and has ever since remained so—As for young Bright, he has not yet been seen by us—my youngest daughter has been attacked by fits, and Mrs. Janson is inconsolable—in short, we are a truly distressed family.”

Mrs. Snowden having concluded the note, cast a glance of much meaning at Theresa, who felt the force of it, not a little—Emmeline had left the room to satisfy Mr. Janson's servant, and Theresa, reading in her mother's eyes her joy at her daughter's escape, rose, and running into her arms, hid her face in her lap. “O mamma,” she cried, while the tears ran down her pretty cheeks, “how much do I owe to your goodness for preventing me from joining the party I so much desired! I did not think such a misfortune could have happened. Poor Mrs. Janson! what will she do?”

“What I should have done,” answered her mother, “had I lost my dear girl—have blamed myself for giving my sanction to so dangerous an undertaking, and have thought myself in a great measure answerable for the accident.”

It was on the following Wednesday morning, that Emmeline, at breakfast, remarked with a sigh, what a grand evening last night must have been, adding, that she could not help wishing her mamma would have allowed her to have been a partaker in the enjoyments. “I wonder,” said Mrs. Snowden, “that my Emmeline, after the objection I made to it, should again mention it with regret; she cannot suppose but that my experience is sufficient to judge for her better than she can for herself.” “But is it possible,” said Emmeline, softly, “that any serious accident could have happened?” “Without a doubt, my love,” answered her mother. “Well now,” she ventured to add, “I really should like to know what.” She had scarcely finished the sentence, when Mr. Bright entered the room: “You will pardon my intrusion, ladies,” said he, “but your servant, madam, (addressing himself to Mrs.

Snowden) said you were at home, and my commission is of the utmost consequence. I have not seen my eldest son since last night: he accompanied his brothers, and some ladies to Vauxhall, and all I can learn, is, that one of the ladies having been accosted by a young officer, my son knocked him down; he was immediately beset, much beaten, and hurried away among the crowd; since which time, the young lady has not been seen: I had heard him say, he expected to meet you and your family there, which made me take this liberty to ask if you had seen him, or heard any tidings of him."

Mrs. Snowden replied, she was very sorry for his distress, but he might have been perfectly sure Vauxhall was not a place to which she would have ventured with three daughters, unless among a very large party of friends. When Mr. Bright was gone, Mrs. Snowden looked earnestly at Emmeline, who felt the rebuke, and burst into tears; when her mother thus addressed her. “I told you, Emmeline, I did not doubt but more reasons would arise to shew the propriety of my having refused your request. You did not think any harm could have happened at Vauxhall, any more than Theresa thought it was dangerous to go on the water, but dispositions like yours require much attention; for, undesigning yourselves, you will never suspect others of guilt, and may become the victims of dissimulation. Continue, my dear children, to put that confidence in your mother, which her love for you deserves, and behave in every respect as you would wish your own children to behave to you. “I am now going out, unless (continued she, smiling) Harriet has some very particular favor to ask.” Harriet replied, she was perfectly easy in the firm belief, that every fit indulgence for her would be provided without asking, and assured her mother of her constant obedience—her sisters repeated the assurance, and Mrs. Snowden left the room.

The application of this tale is, perhaps, sufficiently shewn in the remarks of this excellent mother; and it may but disgust, to endeavour to repeat it in different language.

ARDOUR
OF FILIAL AFFECTION.

IN a pleasant little village lived Mr. Colville and his two sons, William and Charles; the former thirteen years of age, the latter not quite twelve. Their mother being dead, they had long been entirely under their father's tuition, except when their uncle, who lived in the village, desired to have them; which he sometimes did for a month at a time. These two young men were of very different dispositions. Charles was open, generous, and humane; whenever he did a laudable action, no one heard of it but by chance, and then he received their praises with a modest reluctance, that gained him the esteem of almost every body. William, though he publicly professed the same virtues, was artful, selfish, and mean; but by his cunning insinuations he so contrived to impose on his father, that he almost withdrew his affections from Charles, to lavish them on his beloved William. When parents become partial in their love towards their children, they prepare for themselves much anxiety and sorrow in their old age. Hypocrisy and injustice must create suspicion and dislike, and, though they may have coincided for some time, they will prove in the end each other's punishment.

But to proceed—William was so elated at his father's partiality, that he looked on his brother as no longer worthy of his love, and used every means to influence his father against him. Charles bore all his malicious efforts with patience ; he never complained, though his uncle plainly saw that he was harshly treated, and therefore took the more notice of him, and neglected his brother William ; not out of a childish piece of revenge, but because he could not bear to encourage or countenance deceit, and fraternal dislike. This so piqued William, he determined at all events to get his brother into some strait, that should cause his father to turn him out of the house ; it was by degrees he had artfully prejudiced Mr. Colville against Charles, but he now resolved on a master-stroke of cruelty. Mr. Colville had given them both a crown piece on his birth-day, saying at the same time, “ we shall see who keeps my gift the longest.” It was not a fortnight afterwards, that as they were standing at the window, which opened towards the road, a sailor approached with but one arm, and implored their charity, in the most humble and unfeigned terms of real distress. Charles shed tears at his recital, which drew from William only taunts and contempt.

Charles took his crown from his pocket; which his brother observing, said, "Is not that my father's birth-day gift? Do you value it so little as to give it away before you have had it a month?" "No, William," he answered; "I have too much respect and duty for my father, to set so little store by his present; but I think he could not be offended, if I gave some of it to this poor sailor; I wish I could get it changed!" "You may wish," replied William; "I cannot change it, nor would I, if I could; if you are determined to part with it, you had better spend it." "Ah! William," returned the good youth, "this would make this poor fellow happy perhaps for a week; and when once I have spent it, the pleasure is over; whereas were I to give it him, the reflection of the good I had done him would be an unceasing source of satisfaction." William made no answer, but left him abruptly. When he had shut the door, "There," said Charles to the sailor, giving him the crown, "take that; I wish it may be of service to you; it was given me by my father as a keepsake, but I am sure he had rather I should relieve the distressed with it, than shew it to him twenty years hence." He waited not for an answer, but shut the window immediately.

The poor fellow's tears of joy at the sight of the money prevented his efforts to thank him; however, at the very instant, Mr. Norris, Charles's uncle, came to the door, and inquired of the sailor the cause of his agitation. The conduct of Charles he could not enough applaud, and promised the man he would call on him, and examine farther into the state of his wants.—He went the same evening with Charles, having been directed by the poor sailor, and was introduced to a scene truly distressing. In one corner of a miserable little room lay his wife upon a scanty bed of straw, sick, and unable to assist herself; four children were dispersed about the room, crying for food, while she was in the utmost agony for want of it herself. Mr. Norris was much distressed at so melancholy a sight, and having given them some money for present relief, promised to continue his bounty till the poor woman recovered sufficiently to earn her livelihood. He then took leave of Charles, after bestowing the highest encomium on his conduct, and promising ever to be a friend to him.

When Charles entered the house, he observed his father and William talking very earnestly together; Mr. Colville said not any thing to him then, but at dinner behaved to him with more kindness than usual, and was particularly cheerful the rest of the evening. After supper, however, he grew more serious, and asked William to let him look at the crown-piece he had given him; he examined it with great attention, and then turning to Charles, desired to see his. Charles, with a look of mild affection, thus addressed his father:—"O, Sir, surely you will not be angry at my having given it to a poor sailor, who had a wife and four children, at the point of starving; who would certainly have perished, but for the timely relief you enabled me to give them." With a dreadful frown, the cruel father rose from his chair, and leading him to the house door, exclaimed, "Begone for ever from my sight; and let me not hear that you remain in the village after to-morrow." This he said in so horrid a tone of voice, that Charles was forced to obey. It was fortunately a fine night, and he wandered slowly to his uncle's house. As all was quiet, and not a light appeared at any of the windows, he did not like to disturb them, so laid himself on the grass-plot under the shelter of a spreading tree, and soon fell asleep. In the morning, when Mr. Norris opened his window, he was much surprised at seeing a young man asleep on the grass, but still more so, when on advancing to the place, he found it was his nephew. He called his servants, who with his assistance put him into a warm bed, without disturbing him.

In a short time afterwards, his uncle went into the room, where he found him just awake, and wondering where he was. "O uncle!" he exclaimed, "how kind you are to take such care of me; but I feel very well now: I think I could rise, and prepare for my departure." On hearing him talk of his departure, Mr. Norris thought he was delirious from the effect of the cold, so left him for the present. At breakfast, however, Charles related the whole affair; when he had ceased, Mr. Norris exclaimed, “Cruel parent! he will soon find how greatly he has been mistaken; I can read the real disposition of his favourite. And must you quit the village too?—from this day I will not own them as relations; but surely you may stay with me one night.” Charles was resolved to obey his father’s command, and Mr. Norris seeing him determined, provided him with every thing necessary for his departure; giving him at the same time much good advice, and promising still to continue his friend.

Charles left his kind uncle early in the day, that he might arrive at the next village time enough to look out for a situation; and he fortunately addressed a respectable farmer, who was himself in want of a lad. Charles had sense enough to know he was going to enter on a very different sort of life to that he had been indulged in hitherto, so cheerfully agreed to the proposals or desires of his new master. Mr. Leeson was a man of property, and possessed a great share of humanity: he had observed Charles's linen, and was convinced that a country lad in search of a place, could not afford any so fine. When he had, therefore, shewn him his farm-yard, and told him what his employment would be, he took him into his parlour, and thus addressed him. "The conversation we had together this morning, and various little circumstances, confirm me in the suspicion that you are not what you wish to be thought. Now, if you have behaved ill to your parents, and run away from them, or if they have used you unkindly, make me your friend, and I will be yours—I will not divulge your secrets, but give you my advice, or endeavour to reconcile you to them. Charles could not but embrace so generous an offer; he related the whole affair, dwelling particularly on Mr.

Norris's kindness to him. He told the whole with so much tenderness, especially where he thought his father had acted unkindly, that Mr. Leeson was quite charmed with him, and promised him a constant protection. He had lived a long while in the most comfortable way with Mr. Leeson, rising in his favour, and nothing but a few thoughts and tender wishes to know of the welfare of his father, to counterbalance his felicity, when one day he was thus accosted by the gardener. "Sir, excuse me, but I am so sure it is to you that I owe my present situation, (nay, I may say my life,) that I cannot longer withstand expressing my gratitude. You may perhaps remember the poor sailor, whose wife and children you saved from starving—yes, sir, from starving—for I was that sailor, and but for your assistance, we could not have lived another day; my wife and children are now enabled to contribute to their own support, and will be rejoiced to acknowledge their obligations to you. Pardon me, if I detain you longer; I have, thank Heaven, just overheard a conversation that materially concerns you, and hope to be the means of preventing the death of your father and brother."

Charles anxiously demanded his meaning, and it appeared that he had overheard a plan to stop the carriage of Mr. Colville, as it passed an unfrequented road at a particular time, of which some robbers received intelligence. He was proceeding, but Charles would hear no more, only desired he would call him early on that morning, and accompany him, with pistols, to the hedge by the side of the road. The motive of Mr. Colville's journey may not be uninteresting to my young readers. When William perceived how easily he had succeeded in his design upon his brother, he thought he had attained full power to do as he chose, and, proud of his own importance, he adopted so haughty a method of reply to his father, that he could not help taking notice of it: however, he grew worse and worse, and Mr. Colville now seriously repented his unkind treatment of Charles, at the same time resolving to send William to sea, if he did not amend his conduct. Frequent were his promises of amendment, and as frequently broken, till at last his father told him he had spoken to a captain, who had agreed to receive him the very next day. Though this much surprised him, he said little, as he did not imagine his father was in earnest, but he entreated forgiveness. At length the chaise arrived which was to convey him to the port where the vessel lay, and William with his father got into it. The youth at that time began to think him serious, and with many promises of better conduct, solicited to return, but without effect.

They had not advanced far on the road, when two footpads rushed from the hedge, and with dreadful oaths and threats, demanded their money. Mr. Colville not being quick in complying with the villain's request, one of them fired a pistol in at the window. At the same instant, a man flew from the hedge, and fired at one of the footpads, who immediately fell. He fired at the other, but the pistol not taking effect, he seized him by the collar, and tried to bring him to the ground; but the man being stronger than Charles, (for he it was) would certainly have overpowered him, had not the faithful gardener come to his assistance, and secured the villain.

Mr. Colville was a silent spectator of the whole; but his joy was extreme, at seeing his son Charles open the door of the chaise, and affectionately inquire how he did. He desired him and his faithful friend, to inform him, how it happened that they were so near at the time of his danger. When Charles had made it appear by his recital ; that his life had been saved from the instance of generosity for which he had incurred his displeasure, Mr. Colville could not enough express his sorrow at the unkind treatment he had given him. Charles could not bear to receive concessions from a father, and assured him he was perfectly happy, in having had an opportunity of regaining his good opinion, by shewing he still retained the greatest filial regard for him.

But now came the truest instance of his nobleness of disposition ; his brother sat motionless in the carriage, a victim to the robber's pistol, that he had fired in at the window. He lamented his death with unfeigned tears, though the chief part of his life was spent in endeavouring to do him mischief ; but he was his brother, and no cruelty on his part could make the affectionate Charles forget the natural duties of forgiveness and brotherly love. His father now desired to be conducted to his benefactor, who received him with the truest joy, not having been informed of his intention; for Charles had kept it from him, knowing he would have been anxious to dissuade him from the dangerous scheme. Mr. Leeson had therefore been making many inquiries after him.

Mr. Colville sent immediately to his brother, Mr. Norris, asking his pardon, and immediate presence; and Charles had the happiness of being applauded by all, for the propriety of his conduct since his first innocent transgression. The faithful gardener and his family were made comfortable for life by the generosity of Charles's father, which indeed was but the proper tribute of gratitude; but hard was the trial when Charles was summoned to quit a family to whom he was become so dear. Mr. Leeson knew not how to consent that he should go, though he dared not deny a father so great a blessing, as a son possessed of such virtues as his beloved Charles—He blessed him with tears in his eyes as he departed, and now looks forward with the greatest delight to the prospect of his becoming one of his family ; for I must just hint that a reciprocal esteem had commenced between Charles and his eldest daughter ; but should any thing farther transpire, it shall be the subject of a future tale.

From this tale we may certainly draw several very useful lessons. First, that partiality is a dreadful example from a parent to his children ; that hypocrisy must certainly be discovered before it has long continued its triumph, and that an open and ingenuous disposition, with a firm and manly system of behaviour, will ever prove a young man's best protection. We have a charming instance of benevolence in Charles, when relieving the poor sailor ; a deed we cannot but admire, so seldom do we see humanity overcome the fears of being reproved. In the sailor we see the purest emotions of gratitude, from his address to Charles at Mr. Leeson's, and his professions confirmed by the heroic act of rescuing Mr. Colville from the robbers. In William we see many vices ; and it must be with abhorrence, when we read the end of all his malicious schemes, and of his dreadful death. We cannot but pity any youth who goes the path directly contrary to virtue, when by the many instances of the good done by virtuous men, we are enabled to judge the loss that society has sustained.—In Mr. Leeson we see a charming instance of humanity and generosity, in treating the poor youth, who gladly let himself as a servant, with all the friendship due to an equal.

We highly applaud Mr. Norris's character, who so kindly practised what Charles's humane bosom dictated, and what his means would not allow. This brings us again to the character of the hero of our tale, with a few observations on which I shall conclude.

The lovely qualities in Charles call forth our admiration, whether we consider his humanity, brotherly affection, filial duty, or honour; but let not that suffice, my young friends; let him be from this moment an object of your imitation. When you are advised to do wrong, be not ashamed to refuse, with a nobleness worthy the example you have just read of; and if at any time you are accused of actions you know you are innocent of, seek not by mean compliance to escape a temporary reproof, but, conscious of the integrity of your intentions, keep truth and honour for your guides, and your character will outshine the envious endeavours of deceitful tale-bearers.

THE
SILK WORMS;

OR, THE ADVANTAGES OF FORBEARANCE.

By frequent entreaty, and a long series of good behaviour, Colin had obtained his mother's permission to keep a large number of silk worms, that he might once behold the wonderful process from beginning to end, and then relinquish so unwholesome an amusement; well knowing that those insects, when kept in a room, are extremely prejudicial to health. He had purchased nearly two hundred eggs, and was particularly careful in watching them, and placing every little worm, as soon as it was hatched, upon a young lettuce leaf; and as he had kept the eggs remarkably warm during the winter, and the beginning of the spring, he had the pleasure of seeing them reward his care, earlier than those of many of his school-fellows. An infant sister, about five years old, often delighted to see him feed them, and would now and then venture to touch one, but with the greatest caution, apparently sensible of its tender frame; and as she knew the time he regularly changed their leaves, she was constantly at their side before him.

It so happened, he was delayed one morning by business, longer than usual, (and he had been taught that all recreations should yield to tasks, or other business) and his sister had waited till she was quite tired. She walked to the window that looked into his study; still she saw him intent on some apparently important task; she grew restless and impatient ; and frequently was on the point of playing with the silk-worms, to pass away the tedious minutes. At length, however, he came, and such was her joy and earnestness, to see what she had so long waited for, that a too hasty touch threw down one of the papers, and killed twenty or thirty of the little creatures. Her cries at the accident alone affected her brother ; he thought not of his loss, while she was in distress, and did his utmost to comfort her little trembling bosom ; he dried her tears, promised her his cordial forgiveness, and assured her he had still enough remaining. He related the affair to a companion the next day, who said, “why did you not knock the little wretch down ?” “Would that have replaced my silk worms ?” cried Colin. “No ! it would only have increased my distress.”

From this short tale, we learn the great advantage resulting from mildness and serenity. An habitual tranquillity of the passions, renders us able to bear with calmness, what would overcome those who accustom themselves to the indulgence of them. Forbearance is particularly useful to young people; it signifies such an evenness of temper, that its possessor has the power to hear with patience all that may be alledged against him, (though perhaps unjustly,) and can then make a defence with coolness and propriety, which must have a greater chance of carrying conviction with it. Daily occurrences call for forbearance, for in every station of life, trifles must arise to try the temper, which can only be subdued by patience. I do not mean to recommend cowardice, or a mean spirit, I only wish to convince my young readers that if we would sometimes call patience to our aid, our grievances would not be so many as we think them.

THE ACCIDENT.

ROBERT and Frederic were the only sons of Mr. Stapleton. He had spared neither trouble nor expense in their education : and they both, by an attentive application to their studies, seemed anxious to reward his kindness. They were both well-disposed boys, and equally clever, though Mr. Stapleton had ever regarded Frederic as inferior to Robert in comprehension, and treated him with less attention on that account ; though by his own assiduity he acquired as much as his brother in every respect. It was from a love of reflection, and solitude, that Mr. Stapleton had imbibed this opinion of Frederic, which he had mistaken for a natural dullness; and of course, looked on Robert, who possessed great quickness and vivacity, as a far superior scholar. This very great sprightliness in Robert, had given rise to a carelessness of action, which sometimes approached near to deceit; not as an intentional crime, but as a neglected virtue.

If Robert were guilty of any folly or offence, he scrupled not to hide it, if possible, by an evasion, that often threw the blame on an innocent person. This habit, though perhaps many may think it comes under the rank of school-boys' tricks, is a most dangerous indulgence; and unless curbed with care, leads gradually to offences criminal in themselves, and fatal in their consequences. One morning, after having received a lesson on the globes, the brothers were left by themselves in the study, when Frederic, with an unusual liveliness, (which he seldom attempted to exert, but in the absence of Mr. Stapleton,) drew out the globes, and in a formal pedantic manner, was burlesquing the method of teaching the use of them, when by a sudden jerk in turning one of them round, he broke a very essential part of it, so as to render it unserviceable (with regard to motion) in future. Every smile of pleasure was at once banished from his countenance, and a downcast sorrow took possession of his features. Robert, with an ill-timed affection, advised him to put on the cover, place it in the closet, and let the accident take its chance for a discovery; but Frederic could not submit to so mean an action; he alone was to blame, and could not bear that a servant, or indeed any one, should incur the displeasure he alone deserved. It was true, he had not intentionally broken it, but still he merited all the censure the mischance would occasion, and he scorned the least appearance of deceit.

Mr. Stapleton soon entered the room ; and Frederic, boldly walking up to him, with an affectionate squeeze of the hand, related the misfortune, with a modest eloquence his father never before had thought him capable of displaying. “ And will you, Sir, forgive me ? ” he exclaimed. “ Forgive thee ! ” replied Mr. Stapleton ; “ let me embrace thee, a thousand times more dear to me than ever ; yes, my Frederic, your frankness pleads for you, and I would not for my life check so amiable a quality ; continue, my dear boy, this manly disdain of dissimulation, and ever be it your pride to obey the dictates of sincerity and truth. ” and resolved to make the conduct of Frederic his future example.

Robert, ashamed of his advice to his brother, now sympathized in their joy,

Misfortunes, both trivial and important, are common to every one; the most careful are liable to them; but it is not the accident that incurs the censure, it is the omission of asking pardon, or shewing sorrow for the mischance. How much below the dignity of a sensible youth is it to endeavour to screen himself from the reproof he merits, to cast it on a person guiltless of the fault that occasions it! A confession of any accident disarms the anger that otherwise had been prepared for you; and it really gives more pleasure to hear such an acknowledgment come voluntarily from a young person, than a restitution of three times the value of the loss. A young man who has acquired a habit of deceit in the most trivial things, will find it difficult to overcome as he advances in years: besides, if he is once discovered, years would scarcely be sufficient to restore his character ; while he, who from infancy has made sincerity his constant guide, will gain belief in every thing he asserts, and confidence will be placed in every promise he makes.

T H E

PUNISHMENT OF OBSTINACY.

SAM Herbert possessed many excellent qualities, and would have been universally beloved, had it not been for too great an inclination to persist in his own opinion, against that of his elders and superiors. He was, in general, good-natured and friendly; but these qualities were materially lessened in value, by that failing I have just mentioned, which caused him to be continually admonished by his friends, and frequently reprov'd by his acquaintance. When once he had made a resolution, (in which he was seldom very cautious,) no remonstrance had power to make him alter it; he could not brook disappointment, though near fifteen years of age.

Having been persuaded by some rash companions, to go to the Easter hunt at Epping Forest, he signified his intention some days before to his parents. They well knew the danger of the scheme, and how vast a hazard it was for a young man not used to ride, to trust himself on horseback among so great a crowd, as generally assemble on Easter Monday. They were much distressed at his intention, and laid before him, with all the energy parental anxiety could inspire, the perils he was going to expose himself to; they enumerated the carelessness of ostlers, the general temper of hired horses, and the very uneven ground over which he would ride at full speed. Their kind advice was disregarded; he heard, but he regarded not ; and when the day arrived, his heart leapt with joy as he saw his horse at the door.

He rode to the Forest amidst hundreds of others, though few of his respectable acquaintance ; but that did not disconcert him ; he trusted in his own skill, and thought it impossible to come to harm.

He was much delighted at the sight of the cart, wherein was the poor destined stag ; but when he beheld it leap from thence, and nearly overthrow a young man on horseback, he was rather sorry he had ventured, and began to repent his expedition. However, he joined the "motley crew," and was for some time among the first in the chace, though that, probably, was owing to the quality of his horse, rather than to his management or dexterity. But now came the misfortune so much dreaded by his indulgent parents : he had scarce proceeded two miles, when he lost his stirrup, and being on full speed, and totally inexperienced, could not retain his seat; he fell with great violence, and it was with the utmost difficulty that the followers were able to prevent their horses riding over him.

Several of the crowd passed within an inch of him; and as he was not stunned, though in the most extreme agony, he had time to reflect that his obstinate perseverance had drawn this misfortune upon him. How bitterly did he lament his headstrong disposition! how heartily did he repent disregarding his parent's advice! He was taken up, as soon as the throng of horsemen had gone by, and fortunately had not far to be carried, as a public house happened to be within sight of the place. Here he was examined by a surgeon, whom he begged to inform him of the worst that had happened to him, his torture was so great. He was then told he had broken his leg in two places, and that it was dangerous to be removed.

His family were immediately sent for, who came with all possible speed, ready to reproach the unhappy sufferer ; but when they saw his lamentable situation, pity swayed in every breast, and every one compassionated him. They never left him, till he was able to be removed, and then accompanied him to town, where after a tedious confinement, he quitted his bed ; but he will have cause for the remainder of his life to repent of his obstinacy, as he never can recover the use of his leg. He walks constantly on crutches ; a dreadful instance of disobedience to parents, and an example to all who follow so fatal a vice.

There is scarce a failing, but may procure a temporary pleasure to its possessor ; but with the odious vice of obstinacy, what pleasure can unite ? What satisfaction can the possession of a quality create, so universally detested ? To persist in a wrong method of transacting any affair ; to keep a friend in suspense ; or to delay clearing up a disagreeable embarrassment ; in short, to give uneasiness where it can be avoided, surely must afford so little gratification in the practice, that one would imagine some uncommon object, of very material importance to be gained, could only be an inducement to so unpleasant an attempt. Young people who practise this detestable failing, are not aware of the consequences that await it. Society shuns them, as unfit to join in any engagement ; they are avoided even by their nearest connections ; and never spoken to without reluctance.

The tale just related is a melancholy instance of the bad effects of inattention to the advice of those whom experience has made so able to admonish us, and whose counsels are the result of true regard to our interest. Young folks are apt to consider a refusal of any request as ill-natured, without reflecting on the motives that urge it ; it cannot be otherwise than from a kind anxiety to keep them from harm or temptation, and it is ungenerous, and undutiful, to view it in a different light.

THE BARGAINS.

CHARLES Henderson had served his apprenticeship with the utmost fidelity, and to his master's entire satisfaction, who, dying the second year after the expiration of his time, bequeathed to him his business, together with the most unreserved consent to marry his only daughter; on whom he had often observed Charles look with an eye of partiality, though he evidently suppressed the avowal of his love from the most respectful motives. His attentions, though trivial, did not escape the notice of Mary, which her father likewise observed, and the prospect of their mutual affection was his chief consolation in his last moments ; for as he knew the education they had both received, so he reflected with pleasure on the inexhaustible treasure such an acquirement is to a virtuous mind. He knew he had not much to leave ; but he likewise knew that an established trade, when under the jurisdiction of a young man careful by inclination, was a sufficient competency ; for he had found by experience, the endeavours of the industrious are, for the most part, sure to meet the blessing of Heaven. Bred up in the love of religion, an example of obedience and filial affection, and an admirer of domestic duties, no anxious doubt for his child's future welfare obtruded itself into his tranquil bosom ; he died resigned and contented.

An unremitting application to business soon proved to Henderson the good effects of industry ; and the care, and excellent management of his beloved Mary, was an equal proof of the benefit of economy, and a well regulated household. In few words, he felt himself possessed of some hundreds more than his business at that time particularly called for ; and, what was the truest source of his happiness, when he reflected on the means by which he had acquired them, conscience approved the examination. He had seen many of his acquaintance, who as well as himself had set out in life without a capital, and by unceasing attention to trade, procured themselves what they termed an independency. Mistaken notion ! at the very time that their need was the most urgent, they neglected the cultivation of the source of their wealth :—a neglect ever to be regretted—a loss never to be regained. He had seen them, I observed, moving in a sphere infinitely beyond his reach ; he had gazed ; he had wondered ; but till now his breast had been the abode of serenity ; his bosom had never heaved, obedient to the hasty, and irregular throbs of envy. He frequently pondered on the pleasures he enjoyed, and imagination would as often delineate those apparently within his power. Dissatisfied at the comparison, his thoughts were agitated, and he past some days in an unsettled state of mind. He weighed the inconveniences attending his absence from business, against the pleasure he should partake in a moderate relaxation from employment, doubting still which seemed to preponderate. The tender advice of his Mary would have made him relinquish every hope he had began to cherish, had not a most unfortunate interruption destroyed her affectionate endeavours. She foresaw the consequences of his ambition ; it was a pardonable thought ; but when urged, as he sometimes would, it carried him beyond the tradesman ; it was impossible to connect the two pursuits, trade and pleasure ; and her arguments seldom failed to bring him back to calm reflection on the imprudence of the attempt ; but here she was unfortunate. An offer of a horse and chaise from a neighbour going to remove, recalled with double force each former wish ; it was a thing not to be refused ; it was an opportunity not to be trifled with ; in short, it was a most excellent bargain. It was bought : three days in the ensuing week were thought not ill bestowed to enjoy their new acquisition. Mary regretted the mispent time ; but having ever made it a rule to seek her happiness in the reflection of her husband's, she made no observation on the subject. But soon she remarked a change in his behaviour, for which she could not account : the fact was this. He had not foreseen the unfavourable alternative that now presented itself. He, must either purchase a snug house in the country, to keep up appearances, and lose every Monday and Saturday in the week, (days of the utmost consequence in business, I hope no tradesman will deny,) or resign his long-wished indulgence—his one-horse chaise. Reasons on both sides of the question sprung up in his mind by turns, and gave rise to a long train of arguments. What was a horse and chaise without a country house? and what was the use of a country house to one confined in town? And again, how could business go on without personal attendance?—how could pleasure be purchased without trade procured the means?—and how could both pursuits be in view at one time? Indeterminate from the beginning, these reflections served but to destroy that serenity of mind he was once so entirely possessed of. He resolved to sell his chaise; he knew it could not bring him more than half the sum it cost him, of course his boasted bargain dwindled into nothing. He could not find it full employ without neglect of business, nor could he bear the thoughts of parting with it at its present trifling value ; in short, near three months was spent before the resolution was taken to dispose of it, during which time it stood in a neighbouring stable-yard, at a certain sum per week. Alas ! 'twas now too late ; from well known circumstances, the value of the chaise was now become a mere trifle. A third part of the purchase money was offered ; it was refused ; it was not prest again ; a fourth was bid by an acquaintance, he begged a week's consideration ; the buyer had availed himself of the delay, and now refused, for that which cost fifty guineas, to offer more than eight. What then remained ? He saw it useless, and sighed acquiescence, bitterly repenting his yielding to the temptation of a bargain.

He now applied with more than common care to business ; his industry received its merited reward, and he soon found himself restored to his former enviable situation. How sweet was then the congratulating voice of his adored Mary ! how grateful the reply he made her affectionate tenderness. He looked on her as the source and the preserver of his felicity, and dreaded lest some involuntary action might distress her. His real friends were not many ; he had experienced the usual frailty of several ardent professors of friendship, and had confined himself to the society of a few select acquaintance, who, having past the trial with an unwavering perseverance, he thought a sufficient connection. They were not in higher circumstances than himself, if equal ; but having from the first of their intimacy made it a custom to meet once a month at their respective houses, it had remained a rule regularly observed at the usual time. It was his turn to furnish the social repast, which as yet had ever been consistent with the situations of the company: but a rarity presented itself the week before, that made him once more yield to the temptation of a bargain. A turtle had been received in part of payment, for a debt of long standing, by one of his neighbours, who offered it to Henderson, or in fact to any one, for half its value; well aware of the expense arising from so unfortunate a possession, and which Henderson did not give himself time to reflect on. The thought of treating his friends with turtle was too gratifying to be relinquished, and he purchased it, without consulting or even acquainting Mary with his intention. Instead of the smile of joy, at the thought of such luxurious fare, instead of the expected exclamation of rapture at the idea of surpassing their neighbours, he saw with amazement (though she endeavoured to conceal it) her uneasiness at the recital. This vexed him; having been used to hear her with gratitude acknowledge every little attention he paid her. This was a scheme towards which he promised himself not only her concurrence, but a more than common satisfaction, and he was not a little hurt at the reception of his present. Still she so evidently endeavoured to hide every appearance of concern, that he thought it most proper to let it pass unnoticed. But now approached the time for an explanation. The first thing thought of was an increase of number in the visitors; the reason given was, no one ever gave a turtle feast to so small a company. The number invited was between sixteen and twenty, most of them gentlemen; of course, it was necessary to prepare second and third removes, to preserve the appearances of gentility; plenty of wine was the natural consequence, and the day passed with uncommon gaiety and good humour; but on the following day, when the bills appeared, and the whole cost was calculated, Henderson found to his great disappointment, the turtle he had purchased as an excellent bargain, had proved the source of an expense ill suited to his situation, and had literally cost him more than would have maintained his little family for a fortnight. This was not the worst; his fame was sufficiently spread; and there are not wanting those who gladly embrace the first opportunity that offers, of commencing an acquaintance, either by flattery, or some such mean introduction, where they expect to find their reward in good living. Of these he was forced to be the victim for some time, till, disgusted by a repetition of their fulsome compliments, he was no longer blind to their self-interested views, and peremptorily forbade them his house. He was now convinced that his best friend and most valuable counsellor was his beloved wife, and that it is the most unprofitable profession in the world, to be a dealer in bargains.

The preceding tale presents a most useful lesson to young people, in showing the impropriety of indulging their hasty propensities, without considering the consequences likely to ensue. How often do we regret losing an opportunity of purchasing an article at a price considerably lower than its real value, although we have not the least occasion for it, without considering that it must inevitably lead us to expense, to adjust, or make it useful! The numerous victims to this alluring bait, are daily increasing; they snatch at the attraction, eager to secure to themselves some addition to their stock of lumber, to boast of their bargain, or to prevent any other from purchasing, what in a short time they will be glad to dispose of for a third part of the money it cost them. The tale being familiar, I hope it will be sufficiently impressive on my young readers, to render any farther comments unnecessary.

THE

REWARD OF SINCERITY.

AMONG the various virtues instilled by the most affectionate parents into the mind of George Howard, there was not one he cherished with such an invariable attention, as candour. While yet a child, he listened with pleasure to its rules, and as he advanced in years, made it his inseparable guide. He had been early taught that real happiness consisted in an unblemished conscience, and that it was one of the greatest of crimes to misuse that inestimable gift of speech, which places us in so superior a station to any other living creature; and surely we cannot term it otherwise than a direct misuse of speech, to substitute the artful disguise of dissimulation, for the sweetly flowing accents of truth. He was sent on trial, (as it is termed) to a retail tradesman; unfortunately, a man totally undeserving an assistant of such principles as Howard possessed. He had long endeavoured to obtain by trade enough to live upon, thinking to end his days in tranquil retirement; but the methods by which he sought to accumulate, were so contrary to the rules laid down by industry and integrity, and his ideas of gain so very erroneous, it really was no wonder, that when he had been in business ten years, he found himself scarcely better than when he began.

Not contented with a moderate profit, and a quick return of money, (both which a good article will ever ensure) he thought every shilling he could by any other means obtain, an addition to his fortune, not considering the detriment his business sustained by it; for, an inferior article being frequently imposed on a customer, at the first price, it was but natural they should complain; and not only so, but relate to their acquaintance the ungenerous treatment they received. Before Howard had lived with him a week, he beheld with regret the frequent little deceptions (for I can give them no better title,) that were practised with a view to increase the profits of the trade. He shuddered at the idea of being even thought a partaker of the deceit; but resolved never to be led away by any enticement to practise it. His master would frequently laugh at him, when any scruple arose in his mind, which his open and unsuspecting temper would always lead him to mention; but it never had the desired effect on him, and he hesitated whether he should or should not consent to become his apprentice. On the one hand, his duty told him to avoid the temptation of deceit; but on the other, his reliance on his own resolution, strengthened by the excellent lessons he had received from his parents, and likewise the trouble it would create to them to seek for him a new situation, overbalanced his laudable motive for wishing to leave his master; besides which, he had the vanity to think he might in time, by an unremitting attention, bring about a reform in the method of transacting business. Of this he was certain, that if he could not convert his master, his master never should convert him. He had more than once been made the victim of his master's insincerity, and been accused by the customers of having imposed on them a bad article. This hurt his feelings, and he frankly told him, he could no longer bear even to be a spectator of such meanness, when by an upright and candid method of dealing, business would evidently go on so much better. He pointed out the damage of offending a customer, and the consequent chance of an irreparable loss of character. His master plainly understood him, and had more than once been led to reason with himself in a like manner; but the mistaken notion of soon getting rich, destroyed every suggestion of conscience. Still, business decreased; and notwithstanding all his endeavours, he found his accounts so much against him, he began to be really fearful of the consequences, when he was called into the country on very urgent business; where it was necessary to make some stay, and, from thence, as so good an opportunity presented itself, he agreed to proceed on a little journey he had long meditated; all which would take him about four months to accomplish. Howard heard of his intention with the greatest satisfaction, being resolved to seize the offered time, and by every effort in his power, endeavour to retrieve the character the house had lost, by so shameful a neglect as has been mentioned. Before the departure of his master, he desired permission to lay in a stock as near as could be guessed, sufficient to serve him during his absence. He soon obtained leave; "any thing was the best that prevented trouble," was the principal theme of his master's creed; and knowing him to be deserving of an unlimited confidence, he was left sole governor of the house. Howard was now in his element; of every article he had bought, he had ordered the very best in quality, and the next morning went round with samples to the most respectable of his master's former customers, assuring them of his endeavour, during his absence, to give them the greatest satisfaction. He was the more earnest, as he loved his master, and pitied the erroneous notions he cherished. Every body who had once seen Howard, or heard him speak, must have been struck with him; there was something so peculiarly soft and impressive in his manner, with such a tone of sincerity, that one need but hear his style of assertion, to be convinced that nought but truth could flow from his lips. Every thing he recommended was found to answer the description of its quality; not an article would he suffer to be sold damaged in the slightest degree; and in every action of his life, showed so fully the excellence of his principles, that he performed three times as much business in four months, as had been transacted in a twelvemonth previous to the absence of his master. The reason was obvious. A customer gave an order, and desired every article might be of the best quality; they were assured their commands should be attended to, and left the shop, satisfied they should find upon trial, their reliance on his word was not ill-placed. How delightful must it have been to the feelings of Howard, to know that his efforts had reinstated the prejudiced character of the house ! With what joy did he deliver to his master, on his return, an account of the receipts during his absence ! and how highly gratifying was the acknowledgment made by his master, that he not only felt himself indebted to him for the increase, but for the preservation of his trade ; and that he did not blush to declare, that he would from that moment resolve to adopt a plan that so amply rewards itself, in every future action of his life.

An apprentice, who upon his first entrance into his master's shop, shows a careful disposition, is sure to gain particular esteem. A studious endeavour to please can never fail ; for though he may not always be able to perform the task he undertakes, his desire to do to the utmost of his power will ever make amends for his incapability, and his master will instruct him with an increased degree of pleasure. It is not a slow performance of any thing, that ensures care; (I hope no one will so misconceive me,) but there is a kind of method in doing things, which ought to be regularly observed. A person may be quick, and yet careful; and it is often seen, that a slow person may be remarkably careless. Whatever you attempt, be it ever so trifling, begin it with the same care that you would bestow on a thing of consequence; for it is the neglect of many trifles that forms an error of consequence; and imperceptible as the gradual omission may be, it must astonish a reflecting mind to consider the mischief occasioned.

If a young man at his first entrance into public life, either in business, or independent, makes it his leading principle to be candid, and undisguised in his remarks or professions, he will find as he increases in years his word held as sacred, nay more so than an oath ; for those who accustom themselves to take an oath on every trifling occasion, lessen the value of so serious an engagement, and forget its awful meaning, by perverting its original use. On the other hand, if he has once deceived, it will be found a most difficult task to regain that character, one act of insincerity has lost. How frequent are the instances of fraud (for no less can it be termed) in endeavouring to pass bad money, because one has by chance taken it.—Is that a sufficient reason?—ask yourselves, my young friends, two or three questions on the subject, and attend to the replies of Conscience, which are always candid, always undisguised. “ Did I not, when I found out I had been imposed on, indulge the meanest ideas of the person who deceived me?—Did I not in the first heat of resentment (for we will allow a little resentment in such cases) call him all the names I thought the action deserved?—Did I not wish I might soon have an opportunity of exposing him, by publicly taxing him with the deceit?—When you seriously consider the disgrace of such an exposure, you surely will resolve never to risk a like occasion.—You will estimate your character at its true value, and never, for a temporary gain, run the chance of losing what years will not restore.

SELF IMPORTANCE.

FREDERIC and THOMAS were school-fellows ; they were both about thirteen years of age, and of course very high in the school. Had they alone been proud of their acquirements from study, they would certainly have merited praise ; but they indulged a false pride, conceiving themselves of more consequence than the rest of the pupils, and looking down upon them with a degree of contempt ; scarcely deigning an answer to any who accosted them, or asked them a question, and never associating with them, or joining their innocent amusements. It was impossible this behaviour could long continue, without the united resentment of the scholars ; and though they scorned the mean revenge of beating them, they longed for an opportunity of mortifying their pride, and punishing their ill nature. Such an occasion was not long wished for in vain, as the sequel will show.

It is not to be wondered at, that these two self-important heroes should be envious of each other ; every additional piece of arrogance of the one, was an object of discontent, till the other had equalled him, by a like instance of vanity ; in which one day, failing to succeed, they quarrelled, and with all the silly pomp and conceit of challengers, determined pistols should decide the difference. In this important affair, it was absolutely necessary to engage a second on each side, and after much apparent reluctance, two of their school-fellows consented ; having previously concerted a scheme to mortify the combatants, and take a full, though innocent revenge, for their accustomed pride and haughtiness. After having, in vain, endeavoured to dissuade them from their intention, the hour was appointed, and they all adjourned to the garden, the duellists endeavouring to conceal their agitation, which now began evidently to show itself; but the seconds, trusting, from the plan they had contrived, no danger could happen, urged them to the field, with every argument that could inspire courage. In fact, had it not been through fear of incurring the laughter of the whole school, they would gladly now have compromised the affair; but it was too late.—After much time spent in measuring the distance, tossing up for first fire, and instructions from the seconds, they fired at once. At the same instant, each feeling something trickling down his cheek, dropped his pistol, exclaiming, he was “a dead man.” Their seconds, instead of running to their assistance, could hardly keep bounds to their laughter ; but when the fright of the combatants was a little abated, at not feeling any real pain, they confessed they had played them a trick, on purpose to mortify their vanity, and cure them of their conceit and pride ; and that they had so contrived their pistols, that the snap should cause a charge of red currant jelly to have a better effect than a more fatal ingredient. Their faces exhibited a ludicrous proof of the truth of the confession ; and they cheerfully owned that it was no more than their former arrogance deserved, promising at the same time to endeavour to merit the friendship of all their comrades.

This tale teaches us, that to indulge a self-importance, is the only way to lessen ourselves in the eyes of those around us. If we really possess superior merit, no one will deny us our proper due of praise ; but if our merit is merely artificial, in vain will every attempt be to gain the character we arrogate : on the contrary, it will tend to sink us lower in the opinion of our acquaintance. It likewise shows us the folly of pretending to value our honor in one instance, when we often wilfully injure it ourselves. It is not a readiness to fight on every trivial occasion, that denotes a true sense of honor ; but a constant nobleness of behaviour, exemplified by frankness, manliness, and integrity. How much more does it redound to the honor of a young man to settle a quarrel by a cool examination of the cause, (and if he has been in the wrong, to make an apology,) than to take away the life of a man, whom he has perhaps already injured. But when boys presume to adopt so serious a method of deciding a difference, it is highly proper they should suffer a severe mortification, if not a public punishment.

Nancy
Hanks
Lincoln
Public Library